The model of the asymmetric detector which describes the effect of the lateral distribution of electrons in the scintillator on its response to electron impact should be able to reproduce the peak position of the inelastic contribution, and the area under the peak. If required, the simultaneous fitting with the elastic contribution can be used to reproduce the full peak shape with the detector parameters. It can also be used to find the resonance position based on the resonance width and peak shape. In general, the presence of the resonances does not change the amplitude of the elastic peak, but it increases the area under the inelastic peak due to the increased contribution from the incoherent QE part. In order to describe this part of the peak more precisely, one can use combined fit of the elastic and inelastic peak or even considering the incoherent contribution in the total cross section separately.

The fraction of the incoherent part depends on the energy. The resonances which appear in the elastic and inelastic cross sections are of direct interest, since they can be connected
