Automate the creation of file copies Organyze BACKUP is a reliable solution for users who work with important files on a daily basis, since it can automatically duplicate the saved data to the indicated location. The program is suitable for any user who wishes to backup their work, in case of system crash or accidental damage. Organize your backups Organyze BACKUP is capable of performing the process automatically, according to a schedule, as well as on demand. You can create a series of backup tasks, each with its own specifications. Simply check the folders or files you wish to backup, choose a name for the resulting folder and specify the output location. Manage backup tasks Each backup schedule requires that you set certain parameters. You can select the type of backup you wish to generate (full or incremental), its frequency, the maximum number of copies to be maintained on the hard drive and the format. Thus, you can choose to perform the backup on demand (Start manually) or schedule the task on a daily basis, at the specified time. The number of copies to be kept represents how many backup folders can be created before the oldest in the list are automatically deleted. The format selection implies that you can either create plain file and folder copies or add all the items to a compressed, archived format. Backup control dashboard Organyze BACKUP stores entries for each of the task you create in its interface. You can manually start any of the tasks, on the spot, even those set for automatic backup - their schedule is not affected. Moreover, you can easily modify each task or view a list of details, such as file size and available disk space. I'm not doing this as a program for others to use. Rather, I'd like to program a GUI for my own personal gaming needs and save some possible future project into a library or something of sorts that I can simply release whenever the customers wants a new version. These customizations include: - changing "Level" of combat (forces standard item or lowers it to rare and so on. - changes the difficulty - changing the number of available item types - changing the power of items These items are simply created by the user (as I mentioned). So I was thinking of implementing a system where the user would provide a collection of values and the settings would be based on those values. I could then have the system test this collection for a match against the values and then just return a value back. But I am stuck at the concept of how to create that type of system. Something that I'm not sure as to if I'm over-thinking the process to much. - I am using WPF for development - but a console application would work as well. - I have experience creating database driven console applications, but only as a hobby. - I have no experience programming in C# - I'm a complete beginner in programming, and I don't think my major of Computer Science is helping my ability to program in this particular matter, and I'm looking to improve in that area. It sounds like I have a major problem writing a simple program to do this. Should I just write a simple GUI for what I'd like to accomplish? Is this even possible? A: There are several options, all of which would work for what you've described. The
