This invention relates to metallic materials that exhibit both good strength and good corrosion resistance, and more particularly to a new and improved alloying and combination of two or more metals to provide the strength and corrosion resistance which are not obtained when these metals are used individually. In the past, efforts have been made to obtain the desirable properties exhibited by nickel alloys, which are corrosion resistant. However, these nickel alloys have many of the drawbacks exhibited by cobalt and iron containing alloys such as low strength at elevated temperatures. For example, most nickel base alloys have low strength and high ductility at elevated temperatures, in the order of from about 600.degree. F. to about 800.degree. F. In the past, it has been believed that the drawbacks of low strength at elevated temperatures could be overcome by alloying the nickel with molybdenum, which has a stronger tendency to form brittle second phases than does nickel and thus provides improved strength at elevated temperatures. For example, it is believed that alloying with chromium would not be necessary if a small percentage of molybdenum was used to replace a portion of nickel in the alloy to obtain the desirable properties. However, the art has recognized that the relatively high melting point of molybdenum retards the grain growth rate, and thus molybdenum with nickel is not considered to be an effective combination to overcome the deficiencies of the nickel base alloy. As the art recognizes, the high ductility of nickel alloys causes them to fracture by necking and tearing under conditions of mechanical stress. It is now believed that further improvements can be obtained in the high temperature corrosion resistance of nickel based alloys by utilizing the high melting point of a metal such as molybdenum, which has a strong tendency to form brittle second phases, which serve to strengthen the alloy and therefore improve its resistance to stress fracture. It has been believed that higher temperatures could be used in the forming and heat treating processes for such alloys. However, the art also recognizes that such alloys will fail from their high ductility before fracture of the second phases will occur, and thus these materials are not suitable for many applications. Furthermore, it has been believed that the strength of the second phase strengthened alloys would be reduced if such alloys were used in conjunction with a copper alloy
