Therefore, the aim of this work was to test whether the significance of changes in oxygen partial pressure, as a consequence of fluctuating oxygen concentrations in the microenvironment, can be relevant in vivo, using microperfusion chambers. The oxygen partial pressure in the system was regulated by controlling the flow of oxygen-saturated air into the chamber. Human breast cancer cells, MDA-MB-231, were implanted into the chamber; and then the chamber was perfused with air-saturated buffer to mimic the tumour microenvironment. It was found that despite the fluctuations in oxygen partial pressure, the activity of cytochrome P450-dependent monooxygenases in the cancer cells decreased during the period that the air was bubbled into the chamber. This decrease in enzyme activity was more pronounced for the constitutive rather than the induced P450s. Determination of the level of cytochrome P450s in the cancer cells after the experiments showed that the ratio of the level of induction of these enzymes remained constant despite the variations in the oxygen partial pressure. This work revealed for the first time that oxygen partial pressure in the microenvironment fluctuates. This phenomenon and the consequences for the 595f342e71
