The effects of acute loading conditions on knee extensor strength and power: a systematic review. To determine the effects of an acute bout of loading on limb strength and power in healthy subjects. Systematic review. The keywords 'knee extensor', 'joint position sense' and 'loading' were used in PubMed, SPORTdiscus, Embase, ProQuest and Web of Science. The results were limited to full articles in English published in English over the last 25 years, with no restrictions based on design or technique. Only clear and unambiguous studies were included. The narrative synthesis of included studies was used to summarise and compare the effects of all loading conditions. Fourteen studies met the inclusion criteria. Only studies that investigated acute loading protocols were included. The majority of studies found the joint position sense to be superior following a loaded compared to an unloaded bout in the knee extensor muscles. Muscle strength was also greater in the knee extensors following an acute bout of loading. In general, there is good evidence that short, moderate-intensity exercises are superior to unloaded movements or high-intensity exercises for recovery of muscle strength and power within 72-120 hours of exercise. Field of the Invention The present invention relates to a medical device for an implant into the human or animal body that has at least one anchoring device for anchoring the medical device to one or more natural structures of the human body, such as bone tissue, that are provided at the site to be treated. 2. Description of the Related Art To increase the effectiveness of drug therapy, drug delivery systems (DDS) are frequently used that attach, for example, an active pharmaceutical ingredient (API) in the form of a depot to a natural substance such as an osteoinductive bone tissue protein. U.S. Pat. No. 5,869,199 describes a therapeutic agent in the form of a depot being incorporated in a natural or synthetic matrix material and having at least one chemical active agent for specific treatment of the human or animal body tissues, whereby the agent forms a depot at a site in the body that is able to absorb and/or store the agent in vivo for a prolonged period of time. The matrix material is, in particular, an injectable aqueous solution of a specific protein, especially an osteogenic protein for a site or depot is selected. The matrix can also be a hydrogel, a polyurethane, polyethylene glycol, a polylactic acid, a polyglycolic acid, a collagen, a poly-L-lactic acid, a poly-DL-lactic acid, a poly-L-lactic-glycolic acid, or a poly-D,L-lactic acid, especially a growth factor that accelerates the formation of bone tissue. Specific substances are released from the depot over a long period of time in a controlled manner into the
