There has been a constant need for more environmentally friendly, non-biodegradable chemical cleaners, and the market has not yet been able to provide a low level of pollutants and better workers safety. With low level of pollutants being a top priority, little research has been directed toward the low level of pollutants while meeting the disinfecting and cleaning needs of a health care facility. Current sterilization and disinfection efforts have not addressed the needs of health care disinfecting and cleaning in an environmentally friendly, non-biodegradable way. The current disinfectant and cleaning efforts require excessive amounts of water use. It is often customary to hold bottles of cleaning or disinfecting compounds for extended periods of time in line with the timing of the chemical formulation. It has been found that the use of excessive amounts of water to rinse, clean, and disinfect can potentially lead to longer operating times. This can be especially problematic in health care applications. Efforts have been made to move toward different non-biodegradable cleaning and disinfecting compounds. However, these efforts have been ineffective in addressing the needs of an environmentally friendly, non-biodegradable chemical cleaning and disinfecting compound and method of use. U.S. Pat. Nos. 6,099,852 and 6,159,334 issued to Fassler, et al. on Aug. 8, 2000 and Feb. 19, 2001, respectively, describe the use of oxidizing agents for disinfecting and cleaning. This invention is intended to reduce the problem of biodegradation by oxidizing the unwanted organisms. However,

REUTERS/Bobby Yip BEIJING (Reuters) - Honda Motor Co7267.T is to step up product development at its China plant in Dongguan and is reviewing the possibility of local production to meet increasing demand for vehicles at home and abroad, a company spokesman said. Demand for electrified vehicles is growing in China and many carmakers are making greater investments to meet demand, such as expanding battery capacity or rolling out electric car charging infrastructure. Honda has been seeking to diversify its business model in China, to benefit from infrastructure spending and curbs on polluting vehicles, after heavy investments in the country helped pump up market share and margins. Honda has been investing heavily in China - the world's biggest auto market - and last year launched its first compact electric car in China, the Fit EV. "We have an urgent need to expand production capacity in China to meet the rapidly growing demand," the spokesman said, adding the company was assessing the possibility of local production. Car production has remained stagnant in China in recent years, with sales growth slowing in the industry. Honda's spokesman said the company will offer more electric vehicle models including the electric Fit, e-Palette and e-Aston, and will introduce the upcoming new-generation Honda Fit in China.

Quantum chemical studies on 1,2-dihydroquinoxaline-2,3-diones. The structural and energetic characteristics of dihydroquinoxaline-2,3-dione moieties were investigated using the M06-2X/6-311++G(2d,2p) level of theory. The theoretical calculations were carried out to predict the molecular structures and HOMO-LUMO energy gaps of 26 potential dihydroquinoxaline-2,3-dione derivatives using B3LYP/6-311++G(2d,2p) and M06-2X/6-
