We studied the intravascular and extracellular movement of a fluorescent colicine analog, 7-(diphenylmethyl)-2-(1-naphthyl)-1,2,3,4-tetrahydroisoquinoline-3-carboxylic acid, by using an in vivo rat model. The tracer was administered by injection into the tail vein of anesthetized rats and then measured in the liver, plasma, and urine by fluorescence spectroscopy. Results indicate that the colicine analog is rapidly removed from the plasma. This rapid clearance of the compound is consistent with recent studies of the absorption of polyamine analogs in the intestines. Some Of The Worst Mindsets in Business - seanwilson ===== iuguy I'd like to talk about the 'being wrong' one, because this is something I do routinely. We're in a position where we create products for the mass market, and we generally fail. The products we create don't sell as well as we would hope, and when we talk to customers in interviews, we get told that it's because we suck, or it's because we don't fit in with their way of life, or something else, but in the end, it's because we're in the wrong place. Not everyone makes it, and that's part of the business, and we accept that. But I always go back to the same question of "what if we were wrong" so that I can explore the entire space of things that might have gone differently, and the arguments in support of each position. I use this regularly as a way of learning new things, in a business where truth seems to be the predominant way to get ahead. I think we should all do this, when faced with situations we find hard, when we find ourselves in a sticky position, and when we are stuck in an argument we don't want to get dragged into. ~~~ seanwilson Well, being
