The present disclosure relates to the field of computer network communication, and particularly to the field of automatically reconfiguring a network interface. Generally, a computer network interface (e.g., a network interface card) includes a bus structure having a plurality of ports, and each port is configured for communication on a data link with a different type of network connection (e.g., Ethernet, FDDI, wireless, etc.). The computer network interface is used to connect the computer to one or more local area networks (LANs) and wide area networks (WANs) that may be used in sending and receiving data over the network. The interface is also known in the art as a network interface board (NIB). Various examples of computer network interfaces are commercially available from a variety of different vendors including, for example, Mellanox Technologies Ltd., Brocade Communications Systems, Inc., and Emulex Corporation. A computer network interface may be used in a variety of applications and/or networks. Examples of uses include, but are not limited to, (i) low speed computer network adapters used in older computers with 10 megabits per second (Mbps) Ethernet LANs; (ii) medium speed network adapters used in computers with 30 Mbps Fast Ethernet (10× 100Base-T) LANs; (iii) high speed network adapters for computers with gigabit Ethernet (100× 100Base-T) and/or 1000Base-T Ethernet LANs; (iv) graphics network adapters used in personal computers (PCs) with motherboards having graphics cards; (v) gigabit LAN network adapters used in computers having a gigabit ethernet LAN; and (vi) wide area network network adapters used in Voice over IP (VoIP) applications. A computer network interface may be programmed to function either in a static configuration mode or a dynamic configuration mode. In a
