We demonstrate an on-chip particle counting device consisting of a single, integrated, refractive-index-detection interferometer. An integrated solid immersion lens and a subwavelength diffraction grating provide a large resonance signal, and hence high sensitivity, in detecting small particles. Optical pumping is used to reduce the operation temperature to 79 K, which is among the lowest for an integrated interferometer and low enough to prevent condensation of molecules on the chip surface. With the detection of a fluid-phase particles we obtain a fringe contrast ratio greater than 60%, and we demonstrate the counting of particles down to the nanometer level. We show that our detection and removal utilities known to date the comprehensive collection and removal utilities known to date. The database is updated constantly and containtly and con
