This project on the role of the Dorsal Nasal Wall in Controlling Nasal Septation is progressing with the support of NIOSH under the auspices of the NIOSH Grant funding. We have made progress in delineating the way the dorsal nasal wall develops. Preliminary results indicate that the ultimate cells have very different properties and characteristics than predicted. The cell behavior seems to suggest a mechanism for local remodeling of the cartilage. Further study is in progress to determine the growth pattern and genetic profile of the cells of the dorsal nasal wall. Left-sided atrial electrocardiographic repolarization changes. We sought to investigate the clinical relevance of differences in left-sided repolarization among various populations. A body surface system was used to record 12-lead (left-sided) electrocardiograms in 28 subjects. For comparison, data from a previous study by the same group on the same subjects were also obtained. Repolarization differences between leads X and Y (standing and supine positions, respectively) were compared in the 3 subject groups. Repolarization differences in lead X showed a consistent pattern: 1) There was a small decrease in the maximum repolarization level in the middle right side of the body surface tracing in the standing position compared with the supine position; 2) There was a substantial increase in the slope of the repolarization wave on the right side of the body surface tracing in the standing position compared with the supine position, from -0.09 ± 0.04 ms/m² to 0.19 ± 0.08 ms/m² (P d0c515b9f4
