The deal that got 12 countries to agree to reform a trade deal that only affects a third of the world's economy is being put to a vote in the House of Representatives, and Americans have until Oct. 15 to make their voices heard. Five Republicans have signed on to a petition that will now put the TPP to vote for a full year if the required 218 signatures of members of the House of Representatives are signed by Oct. 15. The petition says the TPP “would devastate American agriculture, hamstringing American sovereignty in key areas, and empower overseas corporations at the expense of American workers and consumer interests.” And Representative Steve King, the Iowa Republican who is a member of the House's Tea Party wing, will be a key figure in getting the petition out to the public, as well as advocating for the House to reject the deal. Representative William Flores, an incumbent Republican from the Texas 18th Congressional District, is among the 15 other Republicans who have signed onto the petition. Congress does not have to take any action if fewer than 20 members sign onto the petition. Last month, Republican Senator Mike Lee of Utah was one of the first signatories, along with Democratic Representative Elizabeth Esty of Connecticut and Republican Representative Carlos Curbelo of Florida. But now that five more members have joined the effort, the petition can go before the House within 10 legislative days. Unless Congress approves the TPP, it would still need to be approved by the president to go into effect. Supporters of the trade deal in Congress say it is a way to bring two key markets into America's trading system, along with new markets that were previously closed. TPP supporters say it would open more than 40 percent of the world's economy to U.S. exports, and according to an economic analysis by the Peterson Institute, the deal could add about 80,000 jobs to the U.S. economy.9:06 PM Papillon Pastime, a letterpress printing 595f342e71
