On 17th January 2020, the Ford Foundation announced that it would divest from two companies whose use of forced labour has damaged the industry's reputation. Unfortunately, instead of acting as a wakeup call to other multi-billion dollar companies, as the Guardian called it, the move only serves to reaffirm why they're in this industry to begin with - exploiting the masses who have nothing to lose and making it difficult for the rest of the industry to compete against them. At the forefront of this issue are the fast fashion brands. In 2014, the Ethical Consumer reported that the company responsible for producing the clothes worn in Disney movies was using child and slave labour. Only last year, Ecuadorian children, who produce the shoes of British high street brands like Clarks, clapped with British schoolchildren for a day - in a country whose adult population could feed it for a whole year. Fairtrade, a charity that provides compensation to the workers of third-world countries from whom workers are exploited, estimates that slave wages, unpaid overtime and child labour are used to make 13 out of the top 10 clothing brands in the UK, and only 1 is verified as having been properly audited. In February 2018, a report from one of the most trusted household names in the industry, the Bureau of Labour Statistics, revealed that 29% of the population worked in the US in 2015, with the median wage being $24.00 an hour, which was 2.7% of the median household income. This has risen in the last 2 years and is the highest level recorded since 2005. So you can see why this is an issue. But also why the speed at which these issues are being uncovered is rising - the more people who know about these violations, the more will be able to demand change and the more likely they are to be listened to. So, here we are. One of the biggest household names in the industry is getting its act together and we're starting to see the effects of its publicity. But what is still missing is a truly vocal movement that will ensure that these companies are penalised for their exploitation. So far, that movement appears to be fragmented, coming from activist groups, consumers, the Guardian and the BBC. In the future, that'
