Lead-acid batteries, such as those used in automobiles, generally have a positive electrode active material which is commonly a lead oxide/sulfuric acid mixture which is normally plated as a lead electrode on a conductive grid. The positive electrode is usually coated on a current collecting lead grid. When the battery is discharged, sulfuric acid is produced at the negative electrode. The acid is electrochemically deposited on the positive electrode and reacts with the lead plate to form lead sulfate at the negative electrode. The amount of acid formed at the negative electrode is measured by a lead/acid indicator which becomes coated with the lead sulfate and is then often called a "bloom". The sulfuric acid is also used at the positive electrode as an oxidant. When lead-acid batteries are fully discharged, the positive electrode has a pure lead oxide base, and the negative electrode has a pure lead sulfate. However, the actual physical makeup of the plates in the battery varies considerably over the life of the battery, and such variations can be reflected in physical properties of the battery. In a lead-acid battery, charge is the reversal of current flow through the battery to discharge the battery. Charge normally is from a discharged battery to an overcharged battery. The current flow will usually be in a direction in which acid is being depleted from the positive electrode. A discharged battery usually follows a discharge curve called the "pilo" curve, according to which there is a constant voltage for a period of time, followed by a gradual lowering of the voltage with continuing discharge until complete depletion of the positive electrode occurs. Overcharging normally begins after a battery is discharged until the battery is essentially completely charged and then is allowed to follow the "pilo" curve until the battery is completely discharged. When a lead-acid battery is used as an automotive starter, the battery is normally charged at the time it is discharged. Such a battery is e79caf774b

How to download Internet Download Manager (IDM) v.Politics & Government 10:53 pm Wed November 1, 2013 New York City To Revamp $5 Billion+ School Budget New York City Mayor Michael Bloomberg testifies on Capitol Hill in March, 2013. Bloomberg's 2014 budget proposal proposes cuts in public education, forcing schools to cut teaching positions and eliminating hundreds of thousands of school seats. Mayor Bloomberg's new $75 billion proposal for the New York City public school system would cut the number of seats by more than 100,000 and limit the ability of schools to raise their budgets in the current fiscal year, pushing more education costs onto the city. If approved by the City Council, the plan would raise the minimum hourly wage for school custodians to $15 and eliminate co-pays for free health care for city school students. It would also eliminate the "stop-loss" provision that allows for the city to pay for the education of any child who is unemployed or a full-time student, and would end the summer break for students in pre-kindergarten through sixth grade. Bloomberg says cuts are needed to close a budget gap of $5 billion over five years. His proposal also includes a 3.2 percent across-the-board pay cut for all city teachers and a 5.5 percent decrease in the real estate tax. Teachers unions have criticized the mayor's plan, arguing that it will limit their ability to
