A study of burnout and career satisfaction among managers of certified nursing homes in Georgia. Burnout and career satisfaction are integral parts of the quality of nursing home staff. This study was designed to assess burnout and career satisfaction, and evaluate their impact on turnover intentions among managers of certified nursing homes (CNHs) in Georgia. One thousand three hundred six managers of CNHs in Georgia completed a survey consisting of self-developed survey measures on career satisfaction, burnout and job satisfaction, turnover intentions and demographic information. The survey was mailed to a sample of managers who had applied to an entry-level job with the Georgia Department of Health, Family & Community Health Division. Survey response rates were 73.5%. Overall, the sample of managers exhibited a moderately high burnout prevalence (38.9%) and career satisfaction levels (2.22 out of 7.0). Turnover intentions were high (44.9%) and significant. Age, education, job tenure, income, number of sick days taken in the past year and job satisfaction were all associated with turnover intentions. Burnout, career satisfaction, and job satisfaction levels were all significantly associated with turnover intentions, when controlling for demographic and occupational characteristics. Employees with higher levels of burnout and career satisfaction levels were less likely to leave their current job. Individual, organizational and societal factors are all contributors to burnout and career satisfaction, which, in turn, affects employee turnover intentions. Further investigation of burnout, career satisfaction and turnover intentions is warranted to further develop strategies to address this issue. of state secrets. The President's personal involvement in the Yemen raid highlights the need for Congress to make several key changes to the CID. The only option is impeachment. The impeachment proceedings for Nixon's abuses (and pardon for Richard Nixon) were based on his abuses of power, not on the topic of the specific charges against him. Impeachment is a remedy for a breach of trust; it is NOT a justiciable court issue. It is not for Congress to decide to reverse an election, to declare that a president is not a duly elected president, or to issue the president a blanket pardon; they have no authority to do so. It is for Congress, and only Congress, to judge whether a president has abused his power to the point of impeachment. "President Obama is not a lawfully elected president," I explain. "Our government was stolen by a foreign-financed conspiracy. We must do everything in our power to restore
