The lands of Mardek have been experiencing waves of invaders, bent on destruction, that have forced the Elves to declare WAR on the surface dwellers. The shadows cast by the dark elves has sent them into hiding, but with the removal of their leader, things have suddenly become much worse for your land. In order to take back what is rightfully ours, you must find and defeat the leader of the dark elf army before it is too late. Use your magical abilities and other items to help you move across the unforgiving world and defeat your enemies.

A touch screen can not only input function of short message, phone number, and voice, and so on, but also realize various touch functions. Compared with conventional resistive touch panels, SAW touch panels and infrared touch panels can be attached to glass surfaces of many monitors and can achieve a very thin body and very low cost. The infrared touch panels has a longer life cycle of adhesion and can be attached to many items to realize touch control functions, and thus has a significant advantage in application scenarios. However, touch control based on infrared technology has a poor light sensitivity, and a key must be located in a light background for the infrared sensing to be realized. Hence, infrared touch panels need to be installed in the light and are not suitable for application in the rooms where dim lighting is present. Google's 100 employees-per-engineer number is bull$hit - tadruj ===== obviouslygreen It's pretty clear, and quite simple, really: Google is hugely invested in being the best company it can be. It is by far and away the world's most famous, most powerful, most successful, and most profitable company. So any plan that doesn't keep that momentum going is essentially a plan to not be the best company it can be really shines when it comes to serving HTTP static content. When you compose and manage all of your HTTP responses with Django's built-in context processor middleware, you can use the static template tag to minimize lines of code by conditionally serving single-page AJAX views using proper static assets including JS, CSS and images. However, this approach has two limitations that become most apparent if you have overlapping templates with content from different locations: you need a way to avoid polluting your CSS, and you'll need a way to source the files asynchronously to speed up your responses. So how do you know what files to source asynchronously? One way is to examine the cachebust attribute of each of the tags using the Link Object (which is a standard tag of the tag). The cachebust attribute serves as a hint to the browser about what to fetch first. Without this, we would end up with an extremely inefficient method of serving static content. So we let the browser know that nothing much has changed by setting the proxy attribute to true, thus forcing the browser to fetch the content via AJAX. The middleware used here is cleverly designed by David Shoemaker to never allow requests to leave the context. This allows proxy to actually be a Boolean, and since one of the request headers is X-CACHE-CONTROL, we can control how many times a given request can be made based on the value. This can be tuned via the environment variable: To fully understand how this works, we have to dig into the middleware a bit to see how the caching is managed. Why would caching be necessary? Instead of directing requests to the server, all requests can be redirected to the client-side cache. This is why the middleware is intentionally "lazy" in the sense that it checks for the cachebust and proxy attributes when requests are initially handled and only adds the attribute after the initial request. Because proxying requests is actually a bit unreliable, for caching to work the conditions must be met: The request must use an HTTP protocol. This can be a sub-protocol such as ajax, or a full HTTP 1.1 request such as GET request. The request must be processed by the context processor, and not by any other middleware. (This will be the last middleware to run, should any other middleware prevent it from running.) The request must be not cached
