This paper examines the relationship between two concepts found in support of the Islamic presence in Southeast Asia. First is that of the "Berber invasion" of the seventh and eighth century, introduced into Southeast Asia at the invitation of the Tang. Second is that of the "Tartar invasions", an invasion of the ninth century of Muslims through Central Asia and an invasion of Southeast Asia in the tenth and eleventh centuries. It is argued that the Tang and the "invasion" of Muslims from Central Asia are amalgamated in a shared history and that the two concepts are derived from one another. Two examples are examined. First is that of the "Berbers", who invaded Southeast Asia through the Malay Peninsula in the seventh and eighth centuries. This paper considers in some depth the historiography and historiographic debates about the "Berbers", a topic which has been little dealt with, and examines the historiographic arguments about the origin of the Berbers in terms of the relationship of this to Tang policy. Second is that of the "Tartars", who invaded Southeast Asia through Central Asia and the Khyber Pass in the ninth and tenth centuries. The focus here is on issues of historiography.Monitoring of the total and dust-bound radon- e79caf774b
