There’s something immensely nostalgic about visiting a cottage far, far away from all civilisation. No matter how much I enjoyed Vanuatu, there was one thing about it that I didn’t enjoy: the difficult boat transfers. You might be wondering what I’m talking about if you’ve never ever seen Vanuatu, but the journeys from the airport to the various islands are, perhaps to put it mildly, less than pleasant. Upon arrival at the harbour, the bus will make its run past a grumpy immigration officer who’ll insist that you remove all your shoes before you enter the building. The bus will then drop you off at a dirt parking lot - the only car park in Vanuatu - and you’ll be on your own to decide how, or not, you’re going to get to where you need to go. As an added point of annoyance, it’s very difficult to find maps of the islands, and I got myself completely turned around on my first night of the trip due to the fact that one had been lost. As a result, I walked ten kilometres up the road to the next village, just to be able to find a hotel. I then spent what felt like ten hours in the middle of nowhere trying not to get lost in the bush and met quite a few locals on the way there. I felt very much like I was in an unforgiving JRPG or a Blade Runner movie. It must have worked though, because I was met in the little town by a taxi driver who whisked me to the only hotel where I was staying in the entire country. After a suitably epic night of being caught in the rain by a drunken stranger who managed to stick a cigarette out of my backside despite me saying no, I found the first of several local youths who would come and visit my backpack to sell me groceries for dollars or, in this case, cash vouchers that I could later spend at the ‘real’ shops. To be fair, my backpack looked very dodgy, and it was well past its expiration date, so I paid them very generously. I checked into my cottage for the next week, dropped the backpack in a heap by the side of the road and prepared to slowly drift off to sleep. It was at that point that I began reflecting upon
