IT HAS BEEN suggested I was "grandstanding". I am not. The truth is that I cannot remember the last time a minister was so appallingly honest as Colin Barnett has been. In fact, the only time it ever happened was during the early years of the Herbert Ullmer Coalition - the "sunshine" ministers who were so quick to praise Coalition deliverance in the face of Labor treachery. They were never - at least not openly - prepared to talk about why they were breaking their promise not to raise GST. But on a few occasions, back in the early years, they tried. And they were damned. And they came to the conclusion they'd rather tell the truth than face the outrage of any of the other two major parties. So I'm not suggesting I am saying anything new, but the fact is that the public have never heard so much straight talking about why they have broken their election promises than they have over the last three weeks. And yet another minister, Luke Hartsuyker, is mocking the entire idea. To his credit, he is casting aspersions on its veracity - although I'm not sure whether he is suggesting that people "whine and complain" or that the statistics are wrong. I'll leave the former for him to explain - because, by all accounts, he is a man who can. But the truth is that the intention of the claim is - as John Howard once put it - to "scare the hell" out of an already nervous public. It is an attempt, I suspect, to convince the public that their goal - and the Prime Minister's - is to reduce the budget deficit
