Alastair Cameron added that he has written to NI's chief constable to demand an explanation. Last month it was reported that some officers at the CAA had refused to attend a meeting for staff. 'Lack of leadership' The CAA is the main agency charged with investigating crime in Northern Ireland. The agency's headquarters are in Armagh, but it also has operations in Belfast, Craigavon, Fermanagh, Derry, Newry and Randalstown. "Over the last few years I have observed a lack of leadership from the agency and the senior management team that was evident," Mr Cameron told the BBC. "The agency has become alienated from the Police Service of Northern Ireland and the community. "This has resulted in a few officers refusing to attend a meeting organised by the chief constable for officers in Belfast. "The chief constable has had to ask the Security Service to investigate the meeting and I believe that is the right thing to do. "I have written to the chief constable requesting that an internal review be carried out." 'Proportionate response' Following the meeting, the PSNI denied its officers were refusing to attend, saying they were not "recalcitrant" but a "proportionate response". Police Federation Northern Ireland has described the meeting as a "discussion" and said that several union representatives attended. In a statement, the PSNI said that officers had "the right to refuse to answer questions in relation to criminal investigations, unless explicitly required to do so by law".

"The PSNI respects the right of officers to remain silent as do they (sic) the public, unless a court order is issued," the statement added. It is understood that some of those attending were staff from the CAA's southern region, based in the Republic. The agency's
