I've been playing around with all sorts of different theories and different ways to implement them and I can't seem to find a good solution. Here is the more involved issue: I don't know how many events are going to be required for each of the controls, but they all have similar events and I know that they will all require unique event identifiers. The most obvious solution would be to create a control that is just a big mess of the right control, the required events, and the event identifiers. Then I would create some event handler that looks for the right event identifier and sends the required event. I created something like this
