On Oct. 11, the president announced that the U.S. will proceed with a 15 percent tariff on $200 billion worth of Chinese imports, which is scheduled to take effect on Sunday. For the time being, the president said tariffs will remain at 10 percent, but he will increase that tariff to 25 percent by the end of the year if China does not make "substantial progress" in addressing intellectual property and other core American concerns. At the time, an administration official described the tariffs as a "temporary pause" in the escalating trade war between the U.S. and China. The White House officials told ABC News that the president is still adamant that an agreement with China can be reached, adding that such a deal would likely include changes in China's practices, such as those related to intellectual property. "The tariff increase is over some progress but not over the whole issue," one senior administration official told ABC News. "If you said there would be a deal, that doesn't mean a deal has been agreed to yet," the official added. While the White House officials said they do not want a trade war with China to escalate to a damaging global economic situation, they also said that the administration remains open to changing the tariffs on Chinese goods if a deal is not reached. omega s12 slot cover A stone facing is a human face carved in stone, traditionally with the nose, lips, eyes, and cheeks. It was used for the purpose of decorating the outside of houses and public buildings, such as public galleries, as a form of art. In some cultures (for example, in Africa, Europe, China and Korea) the stone face was an important form of religious expression. The term stone-faced originates from the European period during the Middle Ages, when the face of a building was often a weathering, or "weather-beaten," face. Such a face was often very effective in conveying a sense of permanence and protection for the building. Unlike an idealized face, it was by its very nature slightly ugly, and it developed something of a popular conception to suit its purpose. The first known "face" in stone in the actual sense was made by a French artist, Guillaume Offray de Montbeillard, in 1588. However, the first person named a stone face was probably Harry Gifford, who around that time made a face for each of the many rooms in his country house in Kent. The coinage stone face () is a famous expression from William Shakespeare's play The Merchant of Venice. Etymology The term "stone face" is a translation of Late Latin facies stonai, in turn the diminutive of facies, meaning "appearance, countenance". Pronunciation The correct pronunciation of the term is the French pronunciation, or French spelling with an accent. The letter "s" is pronounced, instead of. History A first instance of a stone face can be found in Guillaume Offray de Montbeillard's in 1588, where he created a stone face for his country house. The first person to be given the name "face" as a description of a stone face was Captain Thomas Gifford, who in the 16th century made a face for each of the rooms in his Tudor house in Kent. It is believed that Montbeillard made his own first stone face after being commissioned by King Louis XIII of France for his 1588 Château de Louveciennes. In 1788, a landscape gardener at Blenheim Palace in England, John Vanbrugh, created a face of exposed limestone with a seated woman in a copper bath
