Â .Q: Using Jenkins Pipeline to build multiple projects in parallel I have a situation in which I have multiple projects that are built with Jenkins. Each project has a series of steps that are wrapped up with the label "build" (part of the Jenkins Pipeline plugin). What I'd like to do is set up Jenkins to be able to build each project in parallel as it's ready. For example, it might be possible to have a job (call it ProjectA) that simply builds project A in parallel with a job (call it ProjectB) that builds project B. A job that builds all three projects A, B, and C would then just run a job (call it ProjectC) that builds project C. This sort of parallelization would be great in cases where there are only a few of the projects, or where the projects are largely independent. However, in the event that the projects are interdependent -- that is, the projects share some files that they must be built in a

I mean, is it possible to change the C++11 standard? Will there ever be a limit to the power of a language? A: C++11 introduced C++ to standardize C++. This makes the biggest changes to C++ for a long time. Modules The #include directive Unified standard library and language features Modern C++ Standards Committee Uniform initialization Standard Library features (threads, regex, stringstream, etc.) Modern C++ features (generators, uniform initialization, etc.) Every new feature, new type, or change to the standard library would need to be adjusted in the standard to bring it in line. Don't confuse C++ with C. C is an embedded layer language that
