I have an ASP.NET application that does all it's logging by way of ELMAH. However, if a user causes ELMAH to output (e.g., a missing input parameter), the users seeing the output will be able to see the error and will be upset. I'd prefer if the ELMAH output were suppressed on the users' monitors. Is this possible? A: You can configure it with the app_error page directive of web.config c9d1549cdd

Fantasy and Reality: Beyond the Human Brain and Beyond Suicide With the passing of GRA at Google Ventures, the 'invest the thoughts & dreams of innovative souls' angel-investing fund, comes the news of just how large these innovative souls are. Drew Houston is the co-creator of Flickr, which is the powerhouse social web photo sharing network, and a small business himself. From the WSJ newspaper article about GRA: The partnership with Google, which became public in July 2008, has made Flickr the photo-sharing site's business model. Mr. Houston still runs the original site, overseen by Chief Executive Officer Mike

Moritz, and he plans to continue managing it. The year is 1929. Arthur Ransome, aged 10, and his new darling, Lucy, dash the rain from the door and race up the stairs to a habitable attic room at the big house. They settle down on a little camp bed (note the one bed, one boy aspect), ready to experience the wonders, eerie and enthralling, that are to be discovered this new year of '30. Lucy hops up and flips down the covers, obediently smiling at her beaming, wide-eyed, sweaty, tiny adventure-loving Arthur. "What are you going to be today?" she asks. From this question, as a little boy listening, I think you get the gist of Ransome's imaginative, yet chilling, outlook on the world. In the book, one day Arthur exclaims to Lucy, that the world's food supply "isn't worth a damn!" Ransome has a felt need to introduce a little destruction, for practical purposes, into the story: Perhaps, the idea is that Arthur's idea of the world may be a little 'What if the world is as fragile as our idealized daydreams?' - so a bit of danger, a bit of mayhem. As Arthur was merely a ten-year old boy when he wrote this, and as life events took him a bit out of his Roald Dahl view of the world (with perhaps the inevitable "blah" financial crises, housing bubbles, and bad stock markets), Ransome's point here is probably a bit less about the rest of us being dangerous, and more of an observation that a society, is not really as "civilized" as we
