We present a case of a 74-year-old male, with a history of ischemic heart disease, chronic obstructive pulmonary disease (COPD), asthma and hypertension, who was treated with ampicillin-sulbactam for left-sided surgical site infection, with perforation of the left-sided sigmoid colon. He was critically ill, with tachycardia and tachypnea. His blood values showed leukocytosis with a left shift, hyponatremia, hypochloremia, increased C-reactive protein, decreased serum albumin, hypokalemia, hypocalcemia and hyperlactatemia.

An enhanced head computed tomography scan showed marked pericardial effusion. Clinically, he was diagnosed with bacterial peritonitis, with systemic inflammatory response syndrome (SIRS) and disseminated intravascular coagulopathy (DIC). We performed a colonoscopy and identified diffuse colonic erosions, with pus-stained semilunar indentation of the colonic wall. The histological examination revealed transmural necrosis and abscess formation. We did not detect any systemic metastasis or metastatic inflammatory diseases. Despite being treated with peritoneal drainage

Video Guide Happy Viewing .A new study into non-invasive brain imaging has found that O2 levels in the blood of a dog changed in the seconds after it was given an electric shock. Whilst this may sound strange, it may soon become vital in understanding the brain's action and reactions, and lead to new ways of treating mental illnesses, and even controlling animals remotely. Scientists used a technique called Near Infra-Red Spectroscopy, which measures the way light reflects off the blood in the brain and the surface of the skin. It can be done non-invasively, as it does not need to puncture the skin to access the blood supply. The scientists found that the blood flow and oxygen levels changed in the brain, in response to the electric shock. They also used a technique that sends electrical impulses to the brain in order to find what happens in the brain when we do get a shock. The study was led by scientists from the University of Lincoln, UK, which is collaborating with the Centre for Neuromodulation at the University of Oxford and University College London. This is
