Reduction of a BKCa-mediated Ca^{2+} transient in rat gastric smooth muscle by a different mechanism than muscarinic M1 receptors. The BKCa is an important regulator of smooth muscle function. In intestinal smooth muscle, muscarinic M3 receptors decrease the amplitude of the BKCa-mediated Ca^{2+} transient via activation of a small GTP binding protein, RhoA. In addition, muscarinic M1 receptors decrease the amplitude of the BKCa-mediated Ca^{2+} transient by activation of PKC. However, in rat gastric smooth muscle BKCa channels are also regulated by a G-protein of the Gq family, Go. It is currently unknown whether muscarinic M1 receptors regulate the amplitude of the BKCa-mediated Ca^{2+} transient in rat gastric smooth muscle by Go stimulation and/or PKC activation. We studied the effects of muscarinic M1 receptor stimulation on the BKCa-mediated Ca^{2+} transient in rat gastric smooth muscle cells (GsMcs). Isoproterenol (1 μ M) decreased the BKCa-mediated Ca^{2+} transient by 11.7 \pm 0.9% (n = 6). Muscarinic M1 receptor stimulation by muscarinic agonist (acetylcholine, 0.1 μ M) decreased the amplitude of the BKCa-mediated Ca^{2+} transient by only 1.6 \pm 0.5% (n = 4). The effect of muscarinic M1 receptors was significantly smaller than that of isoproterenol. Activation of Go with GTP gamma S (100 μ M) decreased the BKCa-mediated Ca^{2+} transient by 19.4 \pm 2.5% (n = 5), a response significantly larger than the decrease caused by muscarinic M
