The US ambassador to Russia has told RT that a new anti-Trump dossier on alleged ties between Russia and President-elect Donald Trump's campaign will "almost certainly" be used. Vanity Fair editor David Hoffman said that the former British MI6 agent Christopher Steele was under "personal threat from the highest levels of the Russian state." Hoffman told RT that "it's a fact that both the Republican and the Democrats are going to get a hold of this and it's going to be made public, almost certainly in a way that's going to damage Hillary Clinton" in the next presidential election. Hoffman described the claims as "impeccable in every particular" because his government "independently tried to verify them." The journalist said that Steele was approached by an ex-MI6 colleague and his partner to investigate the matter. The former Soviet operative "concluded in his own mind that the Russians had been trying to co-opt Trump for a long time," Hoffman said. "When the Senate Intelligence Committee started its investigation into Hillary Clinton's emails, the Russians realized they could influence the election in a way they didn't think they could before." Hoffman added that "his research uncovered things that led him to believe that Trump might be under the influence of the Russian state." The former British agent also claimed that Trump's rumored ties with Russia were not a result of "a strategic alliance, but a strategic capture." READ MORE: Share your harassment stories: RT Listening Lounge While not an attempt to derail his campaign, the dossier, Trump and the media's coverage of it were designed to discredit Trump with Russian authorities, Hoffman said. His research, Hoffman insisted, "wasn't bought and paid for. He was approached because his work was considered impeccable." The new "anti-Trump" dossier on alleged links between Russia
