Two infants, one 12 and the other 21 months old, died suddenly of acute hemorrhagic enteritis. Both infants had signs of necrotizing enteritis and died without having been treated. Mycological and bacteriological examinations were performed and both specimens yielded microaerobic, gram-negative rods. Under the microscope they had the appearance of Campylobacter jejuni. Cigarette lighters have long been used to light cigarettes; however, so long as there were no means for storing a cigarette lighter in close proximity to a lighter source, it was not possible to conveniently light more than one cigarette. Further, in some instances, where it was desired to light more than one cigarette at a time, it was necessary to periodically replace the lighter with a new lighter. In other words, the burning cigarette would sputter or extinguish, requiring the opening of the lighter again for the lighting of a new cigarette. In order to overcome these problems, cigar lighters were developed which included not only a storage container for storing an electrical power supply and a hollow tube with a wick extending from the container and through which a single heat source, such as a match, could be ignited by striking a match in the container. This construction eliminated the need to repeatedly shut off the match in order to relight the cigarette or cigar, but it became necessary to remove the lighter from the container in order to light the cigarette or cigar. In this type of lighter, a hollow tube terminated in a tip so that a burning cigarette or cigar could be inserted in the tip. Once the cigarette or cigar was sufficiently ignited, it would usually remain burning until
