A fluorescence-based quantitative PCR (Q-PCR) was developed for the estimation of the genomic DNA content. Total DNA was isolated from 36 different pure bacterial cultures as well as an autoclaved inoculum of the Escherichia coli K-12 wild-type strain BW25113. The copy number of the gene ftsZ encoding the major subunit of the chromosomal division protein FtsZ was quantified with a sequence-specific TaqMan probe and a SYBR Green I-based Q-PCR system. The complete plasmid pHG1a(F) encoding the promoterless gfp gene of the bioluminescent E. coli K-12 strain MG1655 was used as the model plasmid DNA with known copy number to develop a standard curve. The developed Q-PCR system enabled the reliable and reproducible estimation of the total DNA content of pure strains. In addition, the system was applied to genomic DNA isolated from an autoclaved inoculum. No significant bias was observed when comparing the estimation of the genomic DNA of the wild-type strain BW25113 by using either Q-PCR or genomic microarrays. This is the first report of the employment of Q-PCR in the quantification of the genomic DNA content and an autoclaved inoculum. One thing you cannot deny is that the art of storytelling changed forever with the emergence of television and the storytelling of professional media. But just how big of a shift in storytelling it was was an entirely different story. In this article, we will look at the various shifting roles, changes, and innovations that this shift caused, as well as how it allowed for more stories to be told, some of which were even more entertaining.
