I'm wondering if I can remove all the caching that is going on in my browser and have it completely reload the page from the server. When I refresh a page, all I see in the Network tab is all of the requests. Is there any way to completely reload a page from the server? A: If you are referring to the bandwidth issue that you saw at the picture, it does not mean that the page is being cached. It is a new fetch request for every single request that is sent to the server. In short, the page has not been cached at all. Here is an explanation for this behaviour: Every time a web browser requests a resource, it sends a request to the remote HTTP server. This is called a "fetch" request. When you reload a page, you never change the HTTP request that it makes. It is always exactly the same as the HTTP request that you sent in the previous fetch request. The 400KB that you see is the size of the HTML page. In total, the DOM document that is sent is not smaller. (It is the size of a response of the response that you get back from the server). When you refresh, you get exactly the same thing back from the server. The only difference is that when you reload, the browser does not resend the request to the server. So, that is why you don't see the 400KB of data and you just see

BookPimp.com has a new look! I've been tinkering with the design on and off since I started this blog. After an overhaul, I've settled on a bright, clean and responsive look to accommodate most of our readers and our readership has grown exponentially since I first launched in October 2010. Like most people, I have a bunch of hobbies...mostly centered around my 20+ year addiction to motorcycles and my interests in the amateur radio hobby. However, my commitment to this blog was never just centered

around one thing.
Though some of the original “Twitterpated”
posts remain, there
are a lot of articles,
entries and posts
on book covers and one day I may revisit that subject in a more blog-oriented fashion. For now, it's time for a little book-based fun on the website. The blog archive is still in development. I'm hoping to go through the vintage book covers and Wikipedia articles and pull all the pertinent information onto the blog. That would be something to look forward to. (Thanks to BookPimp.com for such a kick-ass blog site!) Cougar and kitten Cougar and kitten - photo

Big cat species The species is known mainly through the remains of prehistoric cats. It was one of the last species to become extinct. Today the living species of cougar are the cat of Central and North America. Two subspecies of cougar are cougar-black and cougar-white. They live in the north of South America and northern part of the United States.

Cougar This species lives in the north of the United States and Canada and is called mountain lion in the United States. Cougar prefers to avoid humans. When they do approach an animal they expect to kill, they always attack from the rear. At the time of the attack an animal most often run away. If it is attacked, the animal will rarely

fight back. Wardah
