To facilitate the development of a more complete neural model of consciousness than is currently available, we have identified a specific set of cortical and subcortical structures that are critical to conscious sensorimotor processing. We do this by systematically exploring the influence of perturbations and lesioning in these structures on conscious motion perception in normal subjects. We hypothesize that conscious perception of movement is a function of the coordinated activity of the following structures: primary visual, premotor, somatosensory, parietal, and insular cortex, thalamic nuclei, basal ganglia, and cerebellar cortex. These structures form a network of interacting cortical and subcortical nodes that mediate conscious sensation and perception.Kinesius Kinesius (, originally, from) was a native of Phoenicia, and the disciple of Heraclius (Bishop of Ephesus), who succeeded in restoring the Church of Constantinople after the capture of the city by the Persians. The apostle of Thrace, on account of his patience and zeal in endeav
