functional magnetic resonance imaging (fMRI) and magnetic resonance imaging (MRI). The MRI apparatuses are expected to realize various enhancements of image quality. For example, Patent Document 1 discloses a superconducting MRI apparatus capable of imaging three-dimensional images with high spatial resolution and high sensitivity. In the MRI apparatus described in Patent Document 1, a plurality of closed-cycle type superconducting coils are provided and coil assemblies including coil portions are arranged to be displaced in the up-down and left-right directions by a position adjusting mechanism, thus forming a large functional magnetic field space. In MRI, a rapid gradient switching magnetic field pulse is applied to an object to be imaged, and the degree of intensity of magnetic field in a region of interest (hereinafter, a range in which a magnetic resonance signal is acquired) is modulated with a quick switching timing, so that a desired imaging can be performed. Patent Document 2 describes a gradient pulse generating circuit for generating a gradient field pulse as a rapid change in magnetic field. The gradient magnetic field pulse is generated by using an LC circuit having inductance of a gradient coil and capacitance of a capacitor to provide a resonant circuit by feeding a current of the gradient coil to the LC circuit. However, when the switching speed of the LC circuit becomes high, a small time constant of the LC circuit makes a current waveform of a high frequency component appear so that the waveform of the current greatly changes. As a result, the current waveform greatly changes, which leads to a problem of large fluctuation in a magnetic field intensity or occurrence of noise. Accordingly, there is proposed a method of controlling the turn ratio of a capacitor to reduce fluctuation of the magnetic field intensity (for example, Patent Document 3). In this method, a low-frequency resonance circuit is formed by a series
