I have a small understanding of AD, but I'm not sure if the approach I'm taking is the best way to go about it, or if there is a better way I can achieve my goal (connecting a database to AD). So, I'm trying to create a simple web application which, among other things, will allow people to login to the site and have basic information on their account stored within a database. I would then like to use Active Directory to store this information in a central location so that if someone were to request their information, it would be a few mouse clicks away from them rather than running a query every time. The reason I've chosen to do this is that I want to limit the amount of information that I hold in each database. In this particular instance I would have a User database, and some other information about the user would be stored in a separate table which is linked to the main table via a primary key. This would allow me to filter the user's data if needed and also when looking at certain reports. My question is: Is there 6d1f23a050
