Climate change is expected to have complex impacts on terrestrial biomes, and the future nature of ecosystems cannot be accurately predicted using the current understanding of biology. Quantitative modelling of ecosystem change is required to assess ecological impacts and potentially provide a framework for adaptation. Models of ecosystem change can be used to quantify the impacts of increasing temperatures and elevated CO_2 concentrations on regional (e.g. continent-wide) or global scales. Such models have been applied to vegetation and hydrological change, and model outcomes are being used to develop adaptive management strategies.What's the secret to a successful marriage?
