Say I have this object array obj = [{name: 'foo', id: 1}, {name: 'foo', id: 2}, {name: 'foo', id: 3}, {name: 'bar', id: 4}, {name: 'bar', id: 5}, {name: 'bar', id: 6}] and I want to update state in previous object if condition is satisfied in current object. For instance, if name is foo and id is 1 then, state in previous object should be updated with true else state should remain false. For simplicity I'm doing foo['id'] === 1 && foo['name'] === 'foo'. A: By destructuring the object, you'll get into the specific item: const obj = [{name: 'foo', id: 1}, {

Palmar Infantilism Palmar Infantilism is the assumption that the palmar surface of the hand is the primary focus of the right hemisphere of the brain. It refers to the ability of an injured infant to feel with his or her hand, because the primary focus of the hand is on the palm. An injured infant does not feel the sides of the hand because the side of the hand is thought to be a secondary focus of the hand. The ability of infants to feel with their hands is often referred to in the literature as the right-hemisphere advantage. It is a feature of infants and in particular older children that at some point in childhood they lose the ability to use their right hand to detect temperature changes of their hand. The loss is gradual, and has been shown to occur in half the population by age 8. In contrast, a person's left hand retains the ability to sense temperature changes in the hand. One study has examined the brain activity of those with normal and abnormal ability to feel with their hands. The study compared three separate groups of participants, who were shown videos of a hand touching a surface to measure their degree of empathy. Participants in all three groups responded to the heat experienced in their right hand to a similar degree. It was concluded that the ability to feel with the hand is correlated with the ability to understand someone else's feelings. However, those with normal ability to feel with the hand did so to a greater degree than those with problems. This study appears to indicate that those who are most impaired in this ability also have greater difficulty understanding another person's feelings. It is a subjective measure of empathy.
