For over a decade, she has been working with brands such as SENS (Europa Direct Insurance), VIVA (Nordstrom), GAP, and MR PORTER, developing content for their websites and advertising campaigns. She has worked closely with advertising agencies, promoting brands in online media, such as Yahoo.com, Google.com, LiveJournal.com, and Facebook.com. Since her time at HP, she has written for a number of blogs and websites in the tech and fashion industries, including The Next Web, GigaOM, Lifehacker, and Wristpot, and contributed to publications such as MediaPost. She has also built and presented new media products for companies such as Dell, Dow Jones, Microsoft, and LEGO. A dual degree in English and History from Georgetown University, Elisa loves to travel, read, play sports, and binge eat cookies. She lives in New York City with her husband, daughter, and black lab puppy. Ansible, Docker and Vagrant for Modern Infrastructure - StavrosK ===== jondot I'm using Vagrant and Puppet (which incidentally is the same as Chef). I can't say I like it, but it's been so good so far. I think there's a lot of potential for someone like puppet/chef to be able to be used as the 'in-between' layer for accessing services. A chef server allows you to define your infrastructure in chef-speak, whereas puppet allows you to define infrastructure in any language. The problem I've come across with vagrant is that you have to install puppet on your servers with the vagrant provisioner. If you're using an embedded infra like CFEngine this can be tricky. If you're not using an embedded infra, you still need to 6d1f23a050
