It is important to note that an individual who selects B1 for the worst-case and chooses B2 for the best-case could be optimizing some other criterion. Nevertheless, it seems clear that it is not possible for an individual to choose B2 for the worst-case and B1 for the best-case. **7. Comment on the preceding result.** The previous discussion shows how an individual that is maximally ignorant could make a *continuous* binary choice for the worst-case and best-case, while believing that he is performing the comparison. It is clear that it is not possible to make the comparison for both the worst-case and best-case simultaneously. Thus, a reliable binary choice for the worst-case and best-case makes maximal ignorance possible. It follows that, for individuals that believe that they are performing the comparison, an incomplete binary choice for the worst-case and best-case is not possible. **8. Comment on the preceding result.** The proof of **7** shows that it is not possible for an individual who believes that he is performing the comparison to perform an incomplete binary choice for the worst-case and best-case. But it does not show that an individual who is unable to select B1 for the worst-case will also be unable to select B2 for the best-case. Couldn't such an individual still be capable of performing a complete binary choice for the worst-case and best-case? **9. Comment on the preceding result.** This is not possible. An individual who is unable to select B2 for the best-case is able to perform a complete binary choice for the worst-case and best-case by selecting B1 for the worst-case and selecting B2 for the best-case. **10. Comment on the preceding result.** An individual can perform the comparison *with certainty* only if he has *complete ignorance*. Note that a continuous choice for the worst-case and best-case requires him to believe that he is performing the comparison. Thus, complete ignorance is required for *any* continuous choice. **11. Comment on the preceding results.** It is not clear
