Acute respiratory distress syndrome Acute respiratory distress syndrome is an acute form of respiratory distress in which the causes are usually immunological or due to interstitial process. It is distinguished from the chronic form of the same syndrome in which the causes are usually inflammatory or fibrotic.

Signs and symptoms The signs and symptoms of ARDS are similar to those of chronic lung failure of bronchitis. The severity of ARDS is determined by the extent of the lung injury and the patients' comorbidities. Causes Mechanical The cause of the syndrome can be due to anything that impairs the normal function of the lungs. Mechanical forms of ARDS include chest trauma, aspiration, and near drowning. Immunological In immunological forms of ARDS, the response of the body to an antigen or an infection initiates acute inflammation. This inflammation is characterized by the activation of the phagocytic cells in the lung, and the alveolar macrophages exhibit their characteristic phagocytic and antigen-presenting activity. The classic example of this type of ARDS is seen in the acute bronchopneumonia. If the process is too extensive, the immune system loses control over the process and the mechanisms of the body are activated to initiate an inflammatory cascade that could lead to multi-organ failure. Risk factors One of the risk factors for ARDS is Covid
