Two natural scenes are shown. One is a carrot-shaped table with various objects such as a yellow vase, a dog, and a blue plate. The second scene is a more mundane rectangular table set with a dark chocolate-colored rectangle and numerous objects. The table was presented on two adjacent pages: one page for each scene. The context of each set of two images was identical to that of the scene in its corresponding page, and the images were on the same side. In the natural scene condition, observers were asked to judge the table's location relative to the background scene by categorizing each depicted object as either the "table" or "background" category. In the unnatural scene condition, observers were asked to judge the table's location relative to the background scene by categorizing each depicted object as either the "table" or "table with the object." Participants classified more objects on the natural scene page (75%) than on the unnatural scene page (61%). However, when the page that contained each scene showed the scene as it was typically seen in everyday life, the categorization rate was elevated to 83%. That is, a view of the table in the context of the natural scene increased observers' performance, presumably because this view facilitated memory about the context in which the table was typically seen. The researchers suggested that the contextual cues in natural scenes may be used by attention and working memory processes to identify and/or organize items in a scene. These findings suggest that observing a scene might be more useful than observing its parts. The researchers argue that this is probably because attending to the scene as a whole serves to maintain contextual integrity, whereas attending to the table during an unnatural scene changes the context to include the objects on the table, which can easily lead to the incorrect identification of objects as belonging to the table. The researchers propose that this change in context in the unnatural scene might be detected and (slight) processing errors could lead to faster categorization of objects in the background scene. This effect is consistent with a "good objects" model of scene perception in which objects are identified as good when they fit into the context. The researchers suggest that this viewpoint may enhance the scene-making process in natural scenes and increase our ability to construct and maintain coherent representations of our surrounding environment.

Coefficient of restitution The coefficient of restitution, also known as the restitution coefficient and restitution coefficient ( $\epsilon$ ), is a property of the behavior of a solid when it collides with another solid (or liquid). If the coefficient of restitution is greater than one, the solid rebounds (but not all of it) and the coefficient of restitution is less than one, then the solid decelerates. The majority of the kinetic energy of the solid is converted into heat. The coefficient of restitution is therefore related to the energy dissipation associated with the solid. The values of the coefficient of restitution are typically measured experimentally for different materials. For non-reactive solids, the value of  $e$  was often estimated using the theory of elastic collision, but more recently has been determined by measuring the impulse required to produce a collision and using that to calculate a coefficient of restitution. The values reported are usually for ideal solids and do not take into account the deformation of the solid.
