so, be aware of your devices and how they work. when you have software on your device, whether it's your smartphone, tablet, or laptop, you're trusting the software maker to make sure it's safe. hackers are already looking for those weaknesses and using those to get into your system. there's no way to be 100 percent secure, but if you adopt basic security habits, you can make it much harder for hackers to get into your system. so protect yourself, and your device, from malware by installing antivirus software like windows defender or mcafee, and be sure to keep it updated. remember, there's no getting away from malware, and you'll never be completely safe. but by adopting these basic security habits, you can make it a lot harder for hackers to get into your system, and to do real damage. we don't want to put you off our amazing hackathon competition and encourage you to learn how to protect yourself from malware. but if you take the time to familiarize yourself with the tools we have explained above, you can minimize the risk of getting hacked while you enjoy a fantastic weekend of hacking. because of their low cost and their ability to infiltrate end user systems, we're seeing an uptick in the number of attacks targeting mobile apps. as i write this article, for example, there are threats of ransomware to google play, with the same phishing emails as those targeting android devices. if you're an android user, be cautious about downloading apps from the play store. in both the pc and phone hacking cases, the bad actors behind the attacks are active on the dark web, which is a world of its own, separate from the open web. the dark web is made up of websites that require special software to access. the identity of the site's operator is usually hidden from users, who are instead presented with a login form. because they're so hard to access, the dark web is often used for criminal activity, including the distribution of malware, buying and selling drugs, and facilitating human trafficking. if you're planning a purchase on the dark web, be sure you understand the risks.

You may think that only your smartphone can be hacked. But nearly a decade of Android hacking has found hackers willing to perform a lot of their evil antics on the online side of the internet, where they can leverage all the resources of an army of hacked devices at their disposal. Perhaps the most notorious case of this was that of the WikiLeaks cell phone army . Another oft-cited case involved what many believe was the first of several global ransomware lockouts: the widely publicized WannaCry cyber-attack , in May of 2017. Still today, the Reddit forum dedicated to ransoming from the WannaCry worm (whose hidden demand was "5 BTC") hosts a dedicated ransomer. Even the modest assumption that your phone has a far superior likelihood of being hacked relative to your average desktop computer is pretty stunning in the context of Android's growing popularity. However, a hackers' pursuit is not a competition of who has fewer security holes, but of who can hack the most profitable holes. Some of the apps you download may not be in your best interest. It is up to you to decide if you wish to use the Third-party app marketplaces: if you do, you need to make sure you are getting what you signed up for. Apps there are also usually very bad, with known virus and malware developers making a living out of using them to spread. So depending on your organization, threat model, and relationship to the user base, at times you may be a victim of these incidents. With nation-state hackers, the attack will be undetected until detected. Because of this, you can only hope the victim/target organization would be able to identify the incident in advance, which isn't always possible. When this occurs, you could be a victim of a politically motivated hack, but not the hackers themselves. They're just making a point. 5ec8ef588b
