It will pop up a warning. It says that Windows Loader 2.2.1 is an unlicensed product and that it is going to disable some of your Windows 10 features. It also says that you can continue or do a repair. I chose a Repair. So, short version is: Why the loader lock and/or deadlocks? Is the loader lock — if you can believe Dr. Johnny-come-lately — actually in memory anywhere?

Is the loader lock what is causing your application to crash? Are the deadlocks — if any — a result of the loader lock — usually not. Is there any way to change the display order of OS Loaders (Windows as default) Or is it that the Microsoft Loader is not in memory at all for everything but the boot process? I don't know. But it seems that the loader lock is in theory only the thing that is keeping it from being able to change the display order.

So, #1. I don't think the loader lock is the culprit here. I was mistaken about it being in the Windows component of the process. It is, what the memory manager is calling a generic load lock. It's in the kernel, not the application process. Seems to me that this is a Windows thing and the problem does not apply on Linux. I'm going to try to do the same test with Linux and see if this happens with the C code I was testing. It could be a Linux problem. But my guess is that there is a kernel level lock or something that prevents the memory manager from "moving" the windows loader (or any other loadable object). 5ec8ef588b
