intakt lets you sample-play loops back at different tempos or pitch, but the tempo sync controls are in a different part of the interface. in intakt the beat slices are set up in a way that makes it really easy to skip back and forth between slices in any loop in the project, without messing around with the time or pitch controls. the tempo sync controls for each loop are also grouped together in the interface, so you can change the speed of all the loops at once. there's also a certain financial flexibility: if intakt does everything you need, or you already have a sampler, you can get your hands on ni's powerful looping tools at half the price of kontakt. plus, if you already have kontakt you can get intakt for half the normal price (just 99 euros). but do you need it if you already have kontakt well it does have advantages. setting up the relationship between tempo and pitch, and how they sync to the master tempo, is really easy in intakt, and the global and slice-based modulation options are all ready to go. intakt extras also include slice order rearrangement, and quantised keyboard triggering for manually playing back loops in sync. niney the observer dubbing with the observer rar distributed this is how you record notes in intakt. simply hit the record button to start recording. you can record at any tempo you like, even if it's not the same as the loop's tempo. after recording you can drag the note onto the slice you want to use and drag it back off again. you can also adjust the transposition to make it in tune with the loop. this is particularly useful when you need to play a solo part, as you can set the transposition to fit your needs. you can also adjust the velocity for the note, making it quieter or louder. the main functionality of intakt is the ability to edit the shape of a loop, and the different modulation options it offers. this is set up via the mod section of the options bar. you can have up to 20 different modulators, each with their own modulation options. each modulator is identified by the colour it uses to represent itself, so you can have green, orange and blue for example. the option to use a modulator on a note is under the mod function, and is set to one of the modulation types. you can also use sampler modulation, if you want to control the modulators via a midi controller. this is a really useful feature, as you can control the entire loop from one instrument. the most obvious of the new features is the main big n's next-gen loop browser, which lets you adjust the tempo of your loops in real-time. when you're done, you can save your loops as new projects and load them into your sampler, where they'll appear with the new tempo. once you've recorded your clips you can then fine-tune the loops with intakt's new pre-recorded tempo warp feature. that's actually a neat idea, and it works a treat. as for workflow, you can now warp loops with one click of a button. it's a useful feature, and it makes your editing much easier. however, when i was in control of the tempo, it didn't feel as though the tempo warping was being applied in real time, but when i played around with the warp tempo sliders i did notice the loops changing tempo much more rapidly, so i can't really complain. 5ec8ef588b
