You can find the icon in the system tray on the bottom panel of your desktop. The music box was making its way along the strand, beneath the orange sky, when one of the empty forms began to sing. "The Green Hills of Earth," the four-legged mouth began. A dimple appeared in its left cheek, like the mark left by a spoonful of jam, as if it had sucked in the song. "The Green Hills of Earth," it continued, in a high voice that caught and held the summer night, "there's no one I know." The child began to smile. He opened the doors, gazed at the empty beach, and waited. It was always a song he had loved. The song spilled out over the sand, the promenade, the small, shabby town. Across the promenade, the music box had passed the shops that filled the town's main street, and had crossed the wide lawn of the country club, with its lawn-tennis courts and pink-shuttered houses, and its lakeside pool, its boathouse, its tented games and bar. In its song, the child imagined his mother and father, coming home
