Slow-motion video, or video captured at a low frame rate, is one of the most impressive, and oddest, new additions that I've come across. In the 4th version of Photoshop you had to be a bit more precise. For example, you had to carefully crop one frame while watching the movie, and then cut the shot into a new frame and merge the two. It wasn't always smooth, and there were a number of other issues involving the end result. Above: A very simple video of a dog playing in the shallow end of a swimming pool. The clip was taken at a high speed to ensure we could get a clear view of the action. Be wary of the dog's waggle at the beginning of the clip, as it moves so quickly that it can cause the picture to jump. See how you can select a single frame from the movie, insert it at a later time and adjust the frame to the required position at the end of the clip? As you can imagine, this is a great way to get a more polished result. First of all, "traditional" - what's that? The thing about "traditional" is that it's a term so often used by people who want to avoid change. I get it that some old stuff is fine - maybe that's what these old Photoshop files are. Whether it's warmed up chicken or charcoal, some things just need to be touched by time. Older things can look older, but they are not better in any way. Let's refer to it as "slightly outdated". I had this "Why are these traditional colors really old-looking?" problem for a long time. I didn't like any of the icons on my desktop. I didn't like the dropdown menus for the toolbox/navigation panel. I didn't like the layout of the panel on the left. Hmm... actually, I want to go back to that old layout. So I put it aside for years and years.

This most recent Photoshop release is a shining example of the benefits of going back to tradition. What's the truth and the benefit? Instead of being frustrated and tired that I can't go back to my design papers and watch the screen get filled with photoshop experience and tools, I no longer have to do any of that.
