The last major update to Lightroom, the 4.3 release, was a big one. Collectively, the 4.x series has been my desktop photography tool of choice since the release of Lightroom in early 2008. I've never looked back and have to admit that I am glad it exists. It's been a couple of years now but the interfaces are not getting any better and are worse than what they had been. This seems to be a recurring problem with every new PS release. The latest crop, for instance, only aggravates that problem. The question is can it be salvaged, or will it end up being an abandoned ship? Previewing of raw files is a common requirement for a photographer today. Adobe has been slowly improving this preview experience with each lightroom release, and its latest lightroom version has made good progress in this regard. All raw files are thumbnailed without knowledge of their EXIF data. You can enable the Exif data thumbnails as an option if you require knowledge of the EXIF data - a rare exception. I thought removing the navigation tools in raw file dialogs ("drag to browse") was a great idea! Users are now able to browse the image by their corner. However, it raises a major issue. "File" menu will appear after a mid-way press of the shortcut keys (e.g. W). What happens to the mandatory "File" menu item? Many users initially don't like it at all. Adobe needs to either remove the mandatory "File" menu item or at least make it disabled when there are other buttons on panel like the zoom, crops, pan and rotate arrow buttons. The main reason why I have to press F to show the "File" menu is that it takes away my possibility of trying to use crop tool, navigate and provide zoom at the exact same time. I wish I could use crop while a "Show Tool" box always showing. This hassle has become such a reason for many of the users to resort to pointing tools on the canvas, or having the crop tool open all the time so that they can zoom in and out whenever needed.
