As an option for existing customers who are willing to go through some inconvenience, they can join Creative Cloud now and keep the Lightroom 5 and Photoshop plugins for free for one year. You can then pay at any time for the full membership price if you wish. One of the best features of Lightroom is the ability to tag files by burning questions such as "Exposure," "Shutter," "Settings," etc. for later recall. This feature is implemented as a "Smart Tag" (tag that can be used seemingly all over the place without having to insert a "Keyword" or "Spotlight" in each file) that can be entered quickly and consistently. I like the results that are produced. My favorite is the "Lightroom Lighting" tag, which applies to the entire catalog as a whole. It's a benefit to have an answer to the question "What was used to capture the image?" in the very first file I see in an image collection. Also, I can review specifics for the "Exposure" tag very quickly, without tediously having to edit hundreds of images—though I do this when I'm processing 100 or more images. A "Spotlight" has the same effect, though I prefer the more nebulous keywords, as they cover more ground. Rarely (if ever) have I had to go through a learning curve to get where I was better off. But with Lightroom 5, that's where I find myself. My progress on some albums was "on the fly," in that I had a set of familiar-looking tools that I was already comfortable using. That empathy is what made it easy to get the hang of Lightroom 5. It's a notable step forward for the product, and a fine example of Adobe listening to criticism. Less optimal are the hidden layers of features in the new versions, which make a learning curve almost inevitable. I understand why Adobe chose to make so many improvements to photographic tools in this version. However, it also makes it less easy to start with the same quantity of features as with prior versions. While some of these aren't outright my favorites, they are nice (and now so are my results: see the discussion in my "Print and Print Management" review). Confidence in Lightroom's abilities is a key asset. It needs to be; every Company needs to have a photography tool to make its customers feel special."
