Q: javascript show loader during all ajax post request I am doing a quite big update of a list of records. During the update I use ajax post request with a server handling request from Firefox browser. The request takes quite some time and for a reason I can not update the UI until the request ends. But if the browser is locked, the request takes quite some time and this causes the browser to be locked. I would like to have a loader showing the user that the request is in progress. Unfortunately I don't see a way to get an event fired when an ajax request is made and I am not sure, if the loader should be done every time an ajax request is made or only during the request. I am also not sure, how to handle the request with a callback after it finished. Could anybody help out? I would really love to have a loader showing to the user during the update of records. A: You can use the XMLHttpRequest object's progress events, specifically the MSXML ActiveXObject object's send() event See: A: I came up with the following solution: I created a progress bar that starts with a visibility of hidden Loading...
