The steps necessary to produce an integrated circuit often include a number of photolithographic masking and etching steps. These steps are costly and time-consuming. Accordingly, there is a need in the art for an improved photolithographic mask that allows for the manufacture of integrated circuits. To create a photolithographic mask on a semiconductor wafer, the wafer is coated with a photosensitive material. The photosensitive material is then exposed to a source of radiant energy, such as ultraviolet light, in a pattern corresponding to the features to be defined on the mask. The light source is typically a laser, which causes light to be absorbed by areas of the wafer where the photosensitive material is exposed to the light source. The exposed areas of the wafer are removed, leaving the areas of the wafer not exposed to the light source. The steps necessary to create an integrated circuit on a semiconductor wafer are often repeated many times before the desired integrated circuit is completed. For instance, the steps of creating a photolithographic mask for an integrated circuit are often repeated several times over until all of
